Summary
THE RATIONALITY OF SCIENCE: PROBLEMS, CONCEPTIONS, AND ARGUMENTS

The Rationality of Science: Problems, Conceptions, and Arguments (Lublin: TN KUL 2006) discusses a widely debated problem of contemporary philosophy of science, i.e., the problem of scientific rationality. The book is an attempt to give an overview of twentieth century discussions of the issue. I try to answer the following questions: (1) What kind of notion of rationality is operative in these discussions? (2) What problems are addressed? (3) What solutions are offered to these problems? (4) What arguments are formulated in favour of and against these solutions? (5) What epistemological and methodological presuppositions lie at the bottom of these problems, the solutions offered, and the arguments developed?

The book is based on the presupposition that science is a kind of cognition and knowledge. My analysis of the discussions of scientific rationality concentrates therefore on epistemological and methodological issues, and omits many others, for example those concerned with ideology. I hold that the notion of scientific rationality is a particularization of the notion of epistemic rationality. I assume that the notion of scientific rationality is derivative with regard to the notion of science, i.e., the latter determines the range of problems and the way of understanding the rationality of science. I think that no notion of the rationality of science is merely a description of "reality as encountered". All notions are also – at least partly – conventional, reconstructive projections, which to different extents appeal to the history of science. The category of scientific rationality is not an empirical concept but rather a theoretical construct.

The problems concerning the rationality of science are organized into two principal types of conception of the rationality of science, which I name classical conceptions and nonclassical conceptions. In my opinion, they represent separate and opposite ways of thinking about the rationality of science. I do not suggest that the classical and nonclassical conceptions consist of propositions which are unified in such a way that if one accepts one proposition one has to accept all of them. On the contrary, some authors accept only certain elements of a given conception while rejecting or disregarding others. I claim that classical and nonclassical conceptions form coherent wholes and I identify them in contemporary writings.

The distinction between classical and nonclassical conceptions of the rationality of science rests on the following criteria: (1) How the category of rationality and other basic epistemic categories are understood (demarcationist versus antidemarcationist), (2) What notion of science and what type of bearers of rationality are accepted (statements, propositions, theories, actions, the subject – individual or community – doing science), (3) How scientific theories are interpreted and how the relation between the rationality of science and the subject matter of science is understood (realist versus antirealist), (4) How the role of the subject in making science, and the relation between the rationality of science and the subject making science (objectivist versus subjectivist)
